Part 1 — Follow-Up Call Guide

Use this guide for the follow-up conversation after a client receives their report and model.

Goal: find out whether the report and model actually changed how they'd act on this deal, and what they'd have paid for it — not just whether they liked it.

1. Walk me through what you did with the report after you got it.

Listen for: did they actually use the model to adjust assumptions? Did it change a decision, or just confirm what they already thought?

2. What was most useful — and what, if anything, did you not end up using?

Listen for: this tells you which parts of the deliverable to keep investing in vs. trim.

3. Before this, how would you have gotten this information — or would you have skipped it?

Listen for: establishes the real alternative you're competing with: nothing, a slower DIY process, or a paid competitor.

4. If this hadn't been free, what would you have expected to pay for it?

Listen for: ask this directly, even though it's the awkward one — it's the actual point of the beta. Push gently for a number, not just "it depends."

5. Would that price change if this were a subscription or a per-deal fee?

Listen for: tests one-time-consultation pricing against a recurring/return-client model.

6. Would you use this again on your next deal? Would you recommend it to another investor?

Listen for: return intent and referral willingness — both are more predictive than a satisfaction score.

7. Was there anything in the report or model that made you trust it more — or less?

Listen for: direct signal on whether the sourcing/citation approach is landing as a credibility feature or going unnoticed.

Part 2 — Short Written Survey
